Asset Allocation

Market Commentary

2022 was a turbulent year for markets, with the principal concerns being the war in Ukraine and soaring inflation. After a few false dawns, it does seem likely that inflation has peaked, with November's US CPI report showing inflationary pressures continued to ease.

Central banks in the US, UK and Europe all raised interest rates in December, but the market's expectation is that rates will peak within the next few months.

As a recession in 2023 is now the central scenario for many, the judgement on the depth and duration of it is more relevant. We think a recession is likely to be mild. Labour markets remain in good shape, with job openings in abundance. Financial institutions are well capitalised and are unlikely to encounter the kind of liquidity crunch that they suffered during the 2008 financial crisis. There are reasons to believe 2023 could be a better year for bonds and stocks.

The relaxation of China's zero-Covid policy should be beneficial for the country but, as we know from experience in the West, there will be considerable hardship along the way.

In December, we reduced UK assets in favour of overseas exposure. This reflects the Asset Allocation Committee's view that a reduced UK exposure in equities and bonds should provide a better balance of risk and reward.
