Latest commentary

The final quarter of 2020 was a good one for shares, with those in emerging markets outperforming the developed world. Investors took heart from the arrival of vaccines to combat the pandemic, and looked forward to economic recovery in 2021 as the vaccines roll out and permit relaxation of the current controls on social contact and business activity. Markets were underpinned by substantial spending and borrowing boosts from leading governments and from Central Bank action to keep interest rates very low and extend more credit. The pound was generally strong against other currencies so this reduced part of the overseas gains.

The winter has brought more bad news in the form of high caseloads and more deaths from Covid-19 on both sides of the Atlantic. Investors are looking through a likely poor performance for major economies in the first quarter of the year to something better thereafter. The election of Mr Biden as US President heralds more government spending and borrowing to boost things further in the USA, and a strong commitment to the green revolution with investment projects to speed transition to a net zero economy.

All the time governments and Central Banks feel the need to keep interest rates very low and to provide huge support to economies, investors are likely to remain optimistic despite the obvious damage being done to economies by anti-virus policies. Only if inflation were to pick up too quickly or economies to recover too sharply would the authorities be likely to reduce support, which would change the mood. We are also mindful of risks to the outlook such as virus mutations, material disruptions to vaccine rollouts, or policy missteps from government authorities. These markets are dependent on the current very benign climate created for shares by easy money and plenty of government assistance.
