Global markets moved through February with a tone of rotation rather than outright risk-off, as investors weighed cooling economic momentum and persistent geopolitical uncertainty. Global equities advanced modestly, though performance diverged sharply by region. Asia-Pacific and European indices extended recent strength, helping lift the MSCI World Index, while US equities lagged as weakness in mega-cap technology and AI-exposed names dragged on headline benchmarks.

In the US, the S&P 500 slipped for a second consecutive month; and the Nasdaq suffered its weakest showing since early 2025, with a pronounced pullback in large growth stocks and the so-called "Magnificent Seven". By contrast, equal-weight and mid-cap indices outperformed, signalling a broadening of market leadership and a shift towards more cyclically sensitive sectors. Investors rotated away from concentrated AI plays as concerns about rapid technological disruption triggered a wider reassessment of valuations across software, data and payments groups.

Bond markets posted positive returns, supported by declining developed-market yields as investors sought safety amid uneven inflation progress and uncertainty around the Federal Reserve's next steps. Minutes from the Federal Reserve's late January meeting showed policy-makers divided on the timing of future cuts, reinforcing expectations that any easing will be data-dependent. Government bonds benefited further from periodic bouts of risk aversion linked to shifting tariff rhetoric and geopolitical developments.

Commodities were driven largely by geopolitics. Oil prices extended January's gains as negotiations between the US and Iran kept traders on edge, with tensions across the Middle East adding a risk premium to crude. Indeed, attacks on Iran by US and Israeli forces happened at the start of March. Gold continued its multi-month rally as investors sought hedges against both geopolitical shocks and policy uncertainty.

Equity valuations remain elevated but broadly supported by earnings. However, the strike on Iran has introduced a geopolitical wildcard that has prompted a reassessment of assumptions about the outlook.
