Asset Allocation

Market Commentary

From a long-term perspective, the falls in stocks and bonds last year have created an appealing entry point for investors. Equities and bonds have started the year on a positive note amid the continuing easing of inflation. Despite this, UK business surveys point to the likelihood of a recession. High interest rates will increase mortgage costs and continue to constrain spending; this contrasts with the US and Europe, where mortgages are fixed for longer periods.

Data suggests the Chinese economy is recovering earlier than expected. There is the potential for China to become the global growth bright spot this year. Inflation in the region remains low, but we believe it could pick up as the conclusion of China's zero-Covid policy puts pressure on re-opening categories like airfares. Price rises are likely to be less severe than we have seen in the West as supply side bottlenecks in manufacturing, shipping and labour should not be an issue.

In its most recent meeting, the Asset Allocation Committee came to the consensus that equity performance from here will depend on whether the US manages to avoid a recession. The committee believes a shallow recession is likely, with the key supporting evidence being the steep inversion of the yield curve and slowly moderating inflation, which is putting some pressure on the Federal Reserve to keep policy tight.
