Sustainable philosophy

The ultimate goal of the portfolio is to support more inclusive social and economic development and more sustainable environmental and business practices, whilst generating strong and consistent investment returns. Monthly investment update

Markets have got the year off to a positive start as market sentiment showed signs of improving. Two major themes of 2022 were inflation and the knock on effect to central bank policy, and we see this continuing through this year as central banks remained a big contributor to market behaviour during January. Over recent months, we have seen the early signs that inflation appears to be peaking and a period of disinflation may now be beginning in some regions. The market took the commentary from the US Federal Reserve Chair, Jerome Powell, as bullish as he talked to this disinflationary process and abstained from pushing back on the markets expectations for monetary policy over the coming years, something which has featured firmly in central bank comments for some time now. One of the main risks that remain for the US in particular, rather ironically, is the stubborn strength of US economic data with demand for labour still far exceeding supply and recent employment data indicating that the tight labour conditions will take further policy action to unwind. This caused markets to pause for breath and price in a slightly higher terminal interest rate. Policy risk will remain elevated and we continue to monitor our factor risks within portfolios to effectively navigate the coming year. We have also entered another earnings season, reflecting what most of us were already aware of, which is that inflation is starting to bite and fall through the corporate margins and consumer purses but the number of companies beating analysts expectation remains in line with historic levels. We retain our preference for high quality businesses with defensible business models and healthy exposure to more defensive industries such as healthcare.
