Market Commentary

Inflation in most developed economies continues to be high. In the US, the tight labour market is leading to a rise in wages. This should allow the US to avoid an imminent recession, which appears more likely over the first half of next year. In Europe, higher energy prices and ongoing geopolitical instability have increased the likelihood of a winter recession. The major developed market central banks appear determined to lower inflation towards their targets. The US Federal Reserve made its second bumper interest rate rise of 0.75 percentage points, while the European Central Bank increased rates for the first time in a decade. Central banks should be aided by a recent moderation in food and commodity prices.

Early in July, UK prime minister Boris Johnson was forced to resign after losing significant support from his parliamentary party. The race to find his successor has quickly been reduced to two candidates: Rishi Sunak, the former chancellor, and Liz Truss, the current foreign secretary. There are differences in each candidate's fiscal spending plans, but so far investors are more concerned with global factors affecting markets.

At the start of the month, the Asset Allocation Committee chose to increase the allocation to cash by 1% from reductions in both UK and European equities.

Having struggled earlier in the year, growth funds such as Lindsell Train, Jupiter Mid Crossover Cap, Baillie Gifford European and Baillie Gifford American were positive contributors.
