Monthly investment update

October was no exception to the past year with inflation and supply chain concerns showing no immediate signs of easing with higher inflation expected to continue into 2022 and businesses indicating that they also expect supply chain bottlenecks to persist well into next year. Despite these pressures, equity markets continue to press higher, with the US markets reaching new highs and with earnings season underway, many firms are reporting results ahead of market expectations highlighting the continued post-pandemic recovery we are seeing. As we move into the Christmas period, markets are closely watching central banks, particularly the Bank of England and the US Federal Reserve, as they both signal tapering of their ultra-accommodative pandemic policies in response to inflationary pressures and other targets including employment nearing their targets. Talking of policy, the 26th Conference of the Parties (COP26) will be taking place in Glasgow and will be an important step in upping global commitments to accelerating efforts to curb climate change and global warming. As we have been advocating for many years, combatting climate change is not only an environmental and social imperative but it is also vital to ensuring the resilience of our global economy. As sustainability commitments accelerate at governmental level, this will naturally exert pressure on corporates and consumers to adapt to a new way of life and as such will create significant opportunities for businesses providing solutions to our global sustainability issues. We continue to see these structural changes in the market positively impacting the top line growth of companies held within the sustainable portfolios and our quality preference is reflected in the resilience of companies we hold through the pandemic. Our thesis remains that these growth opportunities and structural changes are at a point of inflection and will offer attractive long term opportunities and returns for investors.
